

Book Review

Simulating Information Retrieval Test Collections

David Hawking

Bodo Billerbeck

Paul Thomas

Nick Craswell

Synthesis Lectures on Information, Concepts, Retrieval and Services

Morgan & Claypool

2020

www.morganclaypool.com

ISBN: 9781681739571; 9781681739588; 9781681739595

Testing and experimenting with real corpus versus simulated collection have wide variances. Simulated collection can able to yield results quickly, lead to change the population characteristics, validation, performance prediction and so on. This exercise can also lead to scale up corpora and would result in the predictive accuracy and efficiency of the data.

This interesting book has twelve well-knitted chapters. In the first chapter on Introduction, the authors have presented comprehensively the basic concepts and description about simulated text bed, characteristics, methods used, scope of simulation and its importance. This chapter besides also serve as summary of the book content.

In the second chapter on Evaluation Approaches, the authors distinguished the task based and non-task based evaluation. The measures for evaluation are treated briefly in this chapter.

The length of the documents has impact on the efficiency of the test results. Measuring the document length models are described in the third chapter on Modelling Document Length. Word frequencies play a role in IR system models. Those words that occur with high frequency particularly among few used words, have significance. The word frequency distribution and the behaviour of retrieval systems need to be addressed more to understand the process. These are explained in the fourth chapter on Modeling Word Frequencies, assuming independence. The baseline algorithm could model the word frequencies from text which is detailed in this unit.

In the next chapter on Modeling Term Dependence explains the patterns of word associations. It is useful if the distribution of words follows uniform way. The word frequencies, word co-occurrence and ngram are more described in this unit.

In the sixth chapter on Modeling Word Strings, the authors study the characteristics Of word strings and enlist the methods for its generation. The descriptions of word strings are limited in this chapter as the authors claimed. This chapter is supported with plenty of illustrations and examples.

This book particularly the middle chapters address many technical issues and conceptual issues. Reading this book will lead to gain an understanding the IR concepts.

Hathairat Ketmaneechairat

King Mongkut's University of Technology, North Bangkok

Thailand